news.com.au - Fuel excise cut would do little: Rudd

STEEPLY rising petrol prices in recent weeks would have erased the effect of any cut in the fuel excise, Prime Minister Kevin Rudd says.

The federal Opposition has proposed an excise cut of five cents a litre, which would bring down pump prices by 5.5 cents, to ease cost-of-living pressures on households.

Mr Rudd said a 15 cents a litre movement in petrol prices would have negated any excise cut.

The Australian - Kevin Rudd's energy strategy 'flawed' says Productivity Commission

THE Government's leading economic think tank has launched a scathing attack on one of Kevin Rudd's most significant climate change policies - the mandatory renewable energy target - claiming it will drive up energy prices and do nothing to cut dangerous greenhouse gas emissions.

In a carefully timed submission to the Government's climate change policy review, the Productivity Commission also flagged a review of tax distortions that increase emissions, such as the generous fringe benefit tax treatment of motor vehicles.

Following the recent debate over a possible cut in fuel excises to relieve the cost burden on motorists, the commission has also encouraged the Government to put up fuel prices by including transport fuels in an emissions trading scheme from 2010.

The Age - BP's oil price debunks a bit of a hit and myth

BP Australia has decided to debunk a few "myths" about the price of a litre of petrol in Australia. The company should be an expert, of course. The BP conglomerate is the third-largest energy company in the world and one of six petroleum "supermajors".

The first myth BP Australia is keen to debunk is that Australia is self-sufficient in oil. It isn't.
